Early Inhabitants

The history of Bozeman, Montana, begins long before European settlers arrived. The region was originally inhabited by various Native American tribes, most notably the Crow and the Shoshone. These tribes utilized the rich resources of the Gallatin Valley, hunting, fishing, and gathering in the area that would later become Bozeman.

The Indigenous Tribes

For centuries, the indigenous peoples of the area thrived, developing complex societies and cultures that were deeply connected to the land. The Crow Nation, in particular, viewed the surrounding mountains as sacred and integral to their identity. They engaged in seasonal migrations, following the bison herds and using the valley for agriculture.

With the arrival of European settlers, these tribes faced significant challenges, including loss of land and resources. The discovery of gold in Montana in the mid-1800s intensified the pressure on Native American communities as settlers moved westward.
