This period saw the blending of native and foreign musical practices, which laid the foundation for what would become traditional Japanese music.

Shinto and Ancient Rituals

Shinto, the indigenous spirituality of Japan, featured music as an integral part of its rituals. Various types of music were performed at shrines and during festivals, including:

- Uta: Songs that were often accompanied by instruments during religious ceremonies.
- Norito: Ritual prayers that were recited or chanted, emphasizing the spiritual significance of music.

The Influence of Buddhism

With the arrival of Buddhism, new musical forms were introduced, including Gagaku, which is a court music that incorporates elements from various Asian cultures. Gagaku performances are characterized by their slow, graceful movements and the use of traditional instruments, creating an ethereal atmosphere that reflects Buddhist philosophies.
